the Kingdom since its founding back in 1991, the challenges it has overcome and her optimism for the future.

lysine Khao-Levasseur – who is soon to step down as chairwoman after 30 years of driving LBL International forward – shares how the leading Cambodian construction company has played a pivotal role in shaping Cambodia to where it is today.

Why did you create LBL International in 1991? Why do you choose the construction industry, and why Cambodia?

I came back to Cambodia from France in 1991 after my family, who had remained in this country, told me that it was important to see the country as it was then – much different to how it was when I was growing up as a child in the 1950s and 1960s. I knew that the whole country needed to be rebuilt, so I took what I had learned in France and Cambodia, and set up a construction company.

LBL International's first headquarters in the 1990s was on Monivong Boulevard.

What has LBL’s success come down to?

Among other things, it has to do with the high quality of our work over the years.

Heartiest Congratulations TO LBL INTERNATIONAL ON THE OCCASION OF ITS 30TH ANNIVERSARY

From the management and staff of CE&P CORPORATION

We are proud to be associated with LBL International, Cambodia
A pioneer in the construction industry since 1991, LBL International has completed more than 400 high-profile projects that have helped shape the Cambodian landscape. While its first projects in the 1990s were related to the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC) and the rehabilitation of the infrastructure, LBL later ventured into the construction of commercial and residential projects, office buildings, and luxury hotels.

LBL has been involved in the construction of a power plant and built factories as the Cambodian economy developed after years of civil turmoil. "During our journey, we have worked on some really original and innovative projects for Cambodia," said LBL chief business development officer and deputy director Jerome Luciani-Khao. "We were, for example, the design and build main contractor for the Jay Pritzker Academy in Siem Reap, which is considered the first ‘green’ school building in Cambodia.

"The Pritzker Prize is widely considered the Nobel for architecture, and the fact we were chosen for the design and construction of this project in Cambodia speaks volumes. Just recently we were also the designer and main contractor for the first giant aquarium and zoo in the country," said Luciani-Khao.

LBL’s continuous success has certainly not been possible without its dedicated staff, especially the young engineers who produce such quality work across a wide range of diverse projects. "Without our staff, we would be nothing. It brings us pride to see young engineers and workers applying to LBL as they know that they will be at a place where they will work on a lot of really diverse projects. One company is also a place where they will learn to work with the highest expectations of quality, both internally and from our clients," said Luciani-Khao.

"There is a glass ceiling at LBL, with anyone able to climb the career ladder, and the majority of our directors and managers started at junior level or even as interns is testimony to this. We believe that through our system of training and promotions, we have contributed to providing our staff with experience and instilling high standards, and by extension the industry as a whole. Moreover, we believe that we have also contributed to the development of the country by having had thousands of people on the payroll over three decades. And with the adoption of the Law on Construction in 2019, LBL is already adopting all of these new requirements, conformally and by practice, and it is good that the sector will be better regulated and will improve standards," said Luciani-Khao.

"LBL also plans to increase the sustainability of its organisation as many aspects of its business are not yet optimised – including logistics and transportation, as well as material consumption and waste. "We already started this change by participating in the CEE Competition to reduce our consumption of energy.

"The extension of this first initiative is to have a proper green team with a manager specialised in sustainability to change our company in the long term for the benefit of our employees, projects, our clients and the country," he said.

In order to prepare for the coming years, Luciani-Khao said LBL is to adopt a new brand identity, which will be presented next year. "This new identity will be an illustration of our solid implantation in the Kingdom as a leading company in the sector, and will symbolise our expertise in design, engineering and construction," he said.
